Taking, for instance, the career of law in Prussia, we find that there are 1,851 men who have not only passed through the gymnasium and the university, but have already served the state gratis for about five years, while the annual average demand is 100. There are more than 7,000 examined architects without a fixed employment; it is the same with engineers, teachers in classics, mathematics, etc. These unemployed forces are particularly attracted to the great capitals because everyone hopes that with the many chances they offer he find a gap into which he may jump. Men of university training are almost without exception capable only of intellectual work. If they do not suceced in their branch they cannot besome tailors or carpenters; they must take to pettifogging, giving lessons, copying, writing for papers, etc. There are lawyers, physicians, doctors of philosophy among those who are regularly relieved by the Berlin poor board. All these men are, of course, discontented with the present state of things and ready to join with those forces which hold out hope of overthrowing it.
